Burma Agrees on Identity Cards for Rohingyas

July 24, 2007—With the issuance of the first of 35,000 identity cards to members of the Muslim minority in Burma's northern Arakan State, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees says the Burmese government is co-operating in a first major step towards legalizing the status of the Rohingyas, one of Asia's largest groups of stateless people.

More than 30,000 people registered for a "Temporary Registration Certificate (TRC)" between March and June, according to Jean-Francois Durieux, the UNHCR's representative in Rangoon.

"By the end of August, all 35,000 people who have registered will really get their (TRC) cards," Durieux told The Irrawaddy on Tuesday. "There are more to follow," he said.

The US is funding the US $689,000 cost of the initiative, and the UNHCR is providing logistical support, including a photographer, photocopiers and lamination machines. Registration teams, accompanied by UNHCR representatives, are touring Arakan villages, where Rohingya people are able to apply for TRCs, free of charge.

The initiative is the conclusion of a five year effort by the UNHCR to improve the plight of Burma's stateless, disenfranchised Muslim minority, according to a statement released by the UNHCR Myanmar (Burma) on Monday.

The statement said that although Muslims make up 76 percent of the population of northern Arakan state, the government does not consider them as "citizens", preferring to call them merely "residents of Arakan State," because it does not want to imply they have the right to live anywhere in the country.

Among Arakan's estimated 800,000 Rohingyas, about 200,000 persons in the area are estimated to need identity cards, Durieux said.

The government declined the UN refugee agency's offer to produce hi-tech cards with biometrics and security features because its ordinary ID cards issued to other citizens do not meet that standard.

The question of the legal status of Rohingyas is still unclear, Durieux said. "They are not citizens by law. We do not say this document exists in law. Under international law, it is a temporary document, proving residence not citizenship."

Nevertheless, he added, the issuance of TRCs could be an important step towards a clear legal identity and eventually acquiring full citizenship. "What we need to do now is discuss with the authorities what are the right obligations [relating] to this particular document. This is the biggest challenge and long term effort. The people themselves would, of course, like to be recognized as citizens of this country."

Burma's 1982 citizenship law doesn't recognize the Rohingyas as a national race or as citizens, effectively leaving them stateless, illegal immigrants in their own country. In April, a statement signed by six UN human rights experts including the UN's special rapporteur on human rights in Burma, Paulo Sergio Pinheiro, said denial of citizenship had seriously curtailed the full exercise of the Rohingyas' civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights and had led to various discriminatory practices and human rights violations.

Hundreds of Rohingyas have fled Arakan State by boat in recent months, hoping to Malaysia. But many landed in Thailand and were promptly arrested by Thai authorities, who are now involved in complicated negotiations on the future of the refugees.
